四、閱讀測驗【請依照段落上下文意，選出最適當的答案】

There's some good news for people who enjoy reading. New research from the Yale School of Public Health suggests bookworms live longer lives. The study found that people who spent up to three and a half hours per week reading books were 17 percent less likely to die over a 12-year follow up. The researchers looked at about 3,600 adults aged 50 and older, who were asked questions about their reading habits. While a positive association was seen between longevity and reading newspapers and magazines as well, the link was stronger in people who read books.

However, the study comes with a number of caveats.

First, it is observational and does not prove that reading books actually causes people to live longer. Furthermore, Dr. Murali Doraiswamy, a psychiatrist and brain health expert, points out that the group in the study that read books were demographically different from those who did not; they were more likely to be female, wealthier, better educated, and overall healthier—all factors related to longevity. While the researchers took these factors into account in their research, "statistics cannot ever fully control for such fundamental group differences," he said.

There are also dozens of other factors related to longevity that could have also differed at baseline and were not tested for, such as leisure time, health care access, and genetics. "So the authors are comparing apples and oranges," said Dr. Doraiswamy.

Still, he notes that deep reading does have health benefits, inducing a state of relaxation called "flow" that is like meditation. Such states are known to produce changes in the body that can promote longevity. "But we don't know if that happened here," he said.

Of course, reading is also a very sedentary activity, which studies suggest can lead to an early death. The researcher addressed this and said the benefits of reading may cancel out the negative effects of sitting, but the jury is still out. Ultimately, as Doraiswamy points out, more research is needed. "There are many benefits to reading books such as building empathy and developing the mind," he said, "but it's premature to conclude it prolongs life."
